2015-2018 are emerging as critical years for sustainable finance to transform the financial system to be in the service of sustainable development (Agenda 2030), environment, care and peace. Indeed, financial institutions can take the lead in working for the 'common good' as finance returns to its roots while focusing on how its actions and decisions can incentivize actions by other participants in the global economy around social inclusion, environmental stewardship and economic sustainability.

For a shift to be meaningful, it requires more significant action by 'broad finance' stakeholders whose decisions collectively influence the way finance is allocated, which includes more than just financial institutions. Included in the range of those 'broad finance' stakeholders are traditional players including asset managers, banks and insurers as well as asset owners, a category which includes both the institutional owners such as pension and sovereign funds but also their beneficiaries whose interests are made known through formal and informal governance structures specific to each institution.
